!□!□Note:When the denial word ない is used with a rising tone in itself, it no longer conveys a flat denial but rather your hesitation or uncertainty regarding the claim.

As a result, this intonation is used to express your own judgment about what is stated in the affirmative version of the sentence, and ask for agreement while not imposing your belief on the person you are addressing.

じゃない is usually used by older generation. じゃん is not currently in used.

!□!□Note: Since this intonation indicates that you're challenging the statement, you can add nuances such as "What did you just say?," "Really?," "No way!," and other similar expressions to show your surprise. And depending on how you say it, it can convey anything from sheer surprise to your outrage or ridicule.

You can also express your doubt and surprise if you replace the little い in the with the particle の, it conveys a sense of curiosity.

じゃない (I said, remember? / !)

って言ったじゃん?(↓↑↑↓↓)/ って言ったじゃん? って言ったじゃない(↓↑↑↓↓)

"I said, remember? (I know you do); Intonation is like a question

"I told you, why don't you remember? (Come, on!); Not a question but an exclamation point

!□!□Note: By saying ーじゃない entirely at a lower pitch, you can convey your strong affirmation of a statement, as in, "I told you, didn't I?"

In other words, it is used to point out that something that was supposed to be acknowledged earlier but was instead disregarded or forgotten, has proven to be well-founded. If said very nicely, it can be a gentle reproof, too. But the message remains the same – See, I told you.

Beyond the Basics of くない

~ Splitting < form and ない with particle は for contrast

おいしくはない not delicious (but...)

おいしくはないけど、体にいいよ。 This isn't delicious, but it's good for you.

悪くはないよ! It's not bad (but...)

!□!□It's easy to think of ーくない and ーくありません as units, but remember that they are in fact two separate components: < form + a negative word. Because of this, they can be separated by the particle は to give a nuance of contrast.
